The reaction to fire test based on ISO 1182 and the calorimeter test based on ISO 1716 are standards for evaluating the performance of construction products in fire scenarios. The reaction to fire classification of construction products is a critical aspect of ensuring the safety of buildings. European standard EN 13501-1 provides the reaction to fire classification procedure for all products and building elements, part of the European classification system for the reaction to fire of building products. This standard covers the spread of flame and the contribution to fire, including parameters such as flame spread, extend, and the rate of heat release. It also covers the toxicity of smoke, density, and combustion results.

The criteria for a true fire retardant, as recommended by ACM, include a mix and density of non-combustible materials, along with an intermediate scale multi-story test like NFPA 285 or BS 8414, which addresses most of the key performance parameters. Other European standards such as EN 13501-1 provide the reaction to fire classification for construction products and building elements. These standards are used to ensure that building products meet the required performance criteria and contribute to overall fire safety in buildings.
