The purpose of this study was to evaluate liver function after high-dose liver stereotactic body radiation therapy (SBRT) in the treatment of metastatic and primary malignancies of the liver using the Child-Pugh score classification system methods and material. This was a retrospective, single-center study of 188 patients with liver cancer. The primary endpoint was the ability to undergo SBRT. The study population was composed of 188 patients with liver cancer who underwent SBRT at the Department of Radiation Oncology and Biomedical Engineering. The study evaluated the impact of SBRT on liver function. The patients were divided into two groups: those who underwent SBRT and those who did not. The study found that the Child-Pugh score was significantly lower in the SBRT group, indicating improved liver function. The study concluded that liver function was significantly improved after SBRT, which is a promising finding for the treatment of liver cancer.
